Foreign Commerce and Protection. First published in the AMLENS RE LEC Not the least beneficial effect of the McKinley tariff law has been the ulargement of our foreign commerce hat has succeeded its passage.

While selling more than formerly to But not of things that we can make for ourselves. The McKinley bill, by reducing or repealing the duties on what we do not make at all, or not in sufficient quantity, gave an opportunity of buying more freely than before in foreign markets. On the other hand, by placing higher duties on what we can make for ourselves it increased domestic products and reduced prices. During the past year Europe has before, the figures as to American exports standing thus:

$98,990,214 91.344,155 December, 1881. 92,966,0 0 October, 1889. 97,928.446 Octob r, 1890.. ... 98,451,752 ecember, 1890, 98,451,752

Nevyr until October, 1891, did our exports, mostly agricultural, aggregate $100,000,000.

The policy of protection is to increase our own products, whether agricultural or manufactured. For long years to come Europe will give a market to our agricultural surplus and the reciprocity clause of the new tariff bill will enlarge that market. American free traders foolishly predicted that the imposition of higher duties on things that we can make for United States senators occurred April ourselves would force Europe to cease buying from us those things that we produce and that are necessary to European existence.
